

Policy Section Travel Support Awards

The Policy Section offers travel support awards to encourage and support undergraduate and graduate student attendance at the annual ESA meeting.

Criteria

The Policy Section award targets students presenting ecological research that is designed to be used by policy-makers or other environmental decision-makers. For example, the research might apply to: local, state, federal, international, or multi-jurisdictional environmental policy-making; private or corporate environmental resource management; or site or community-specific land, water, or biological resource management. We will also consider interdisciplinary or translational research that includes human dimensions of conducting and applying ecological data and knowledge to policy-making and community problem-solving. Research projects that contribute to the 2019 meeting topic of Bridging Communities & Ecosystems: Inclusion as an Ecological Imperative as described below are encouraged.

The community of people engaged in the science of ecology is transforming, bringing important new perspectives into the field. Inclusive approaches to ecology can build bridges between theory and practice, connect those working in disparate landscapes and subdisciplines, and incorporate diverse perspectives. Such approaches support ecologists and the ecological community as a whole as they articulate socio-environmental connections, address widespread ecosystem change, take advantage of technological advancements that provide unprecedented access to data and new analytical techniques, and engage in interdisciplinary collaborations.

Three awards of up to $700 will be given for invited talks and/or posters from both undergraduate and graduate students. We may offer additional awards depending on demonstrated applicant needs. We particularly welcome applications from students banned from using state funds to travel to the ESA 2019 meeting location in Kentucky due to Senate Bill 17.
